PHOTOS

Opportunity fair highlights programs

Lily Rand
Photo Editor

On March 25, students gathered in the Multicultural Center for the Organization of Latin American Students General Body Meeting and Opportunity Fair, an event designed to introduce the campus community to the many Latin American studies programs and cultural initiatives available at the university. The fair brought together several campus partners, including the Women in Leadership Academy, Guiding Eyes Puppy Raising, the Center for Academic Success and Accessibility Services, the Office of International Education and more. Students received passport style cards and visited each table to collect stamps while learning about academic pathways, student organizations and support services. The atmosphere was lively and welcoming, with students stopping by between classes to explore opportunities, build connections and engage with the broader campus community.

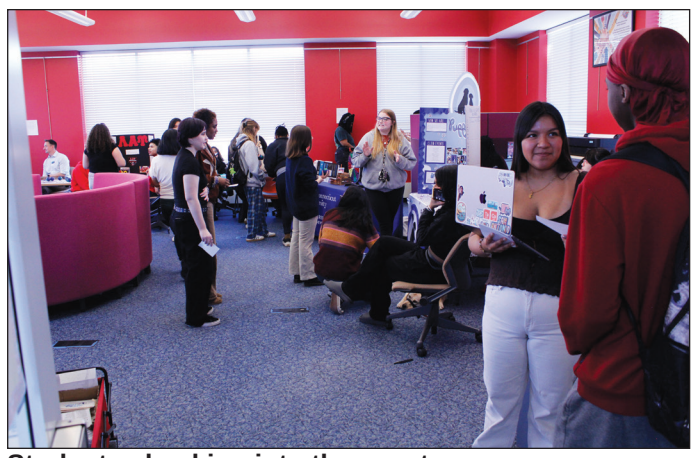
Photos: William Gagné

For more look at page 1

The Center for Academic Success and Accessibility staff handing out informational papers.

Members of UndocuAlly Student Alliance talking to students about their program.

Welcome sign for the Organization of Latin American Students Oppurtunity Fair.



Students checking into the event.

Students walking around, visiting the Office of International Education table.

Women navigating in academia hold panel

Javon Noblin, registrar services assistant, and Julia Irwin, interim provost, speaking on the panel.

Isabel Logan, associate professor of social work, talking while her colleagues listen.

Lily Rand
Photo Editor

On March 24, the university hosted Yes, You Belong: Women Navigating Academia, a Women's History Month panel focused on imposter syndrome and the challenges women face in higher education. Held in the School of Business, the event brought together campus leaders who shared personal reflections on self-doubt, resilience, professional identity and belonging. Panelists included Sandra Bulmer, interim president; Isabel Logan, associate professor of social work; Rabia Hos, school of graduate and professional studies dean; Siobhan Carter-David, associate professor of history and women's and gender studies; Javon Noblin, registrar services assistant; and Julia Irwin, interim provost. The discussion was moderated by Jess Gregory of educational leadership and policy studies. Speakers highlighted the ways women navigate uncertainty while developing confidence in academic and leadership spaces. The event created an open environment for connection, encouragement and meaningful dialogue across the campus community.

Photos: Wade Barillaro

More on page 2

Interim President Sandra Bulmer and Rabia Hos, school of graduate and professional studies dean, sitting on the panel to speak about their experiences in academia.

Students and faculty at the event.

Informational pamphlets with inspirational pins given out at the event.