The Integrated Refugee & Immigrant Services held its annual craft fair on the driveway of First Presbyterian Church New Haven, the farthest stop from Old Campus on the blue route of the Yale Shuttle. Three months into my first semester at Yale, I've learned that working on stories like this one is the best way to become familiar with the city I now call home.

My first stop was the IRIS merchandise and information stand, run by Tetyana Pavelo of the nonprofit's community engagement department. I spent the afternoon wandering the stands, which featured a variety of art and clothing styles, and chatting with people at the event. The late-fall chill meant many vendors began packing up slightly earlier than their planned 5 p.m. end time. My walk home, in the fading daylight, featured the best of New Haven's fall colors. I made it back to my dorm just before the sun had fully set.

CORRECTION:
On Oct. 30, the News published an article titled "McInnis was paid $890,000 in 2024-25, lowest among Ivy peers that year." The article examined Yale and peer universities' IRS Form 990 for the 2024-25 fiscal year, between July 2024 and June 2025. It reported that Yale President Maurie McInnis, who received $890,194, was the lowest-paid Ivy League president in that period.

Over the course of reporting another article, we learned that although the Form 990 is filed by fiscal year, it reports compensation by the calendar year that ends during or with the fiscal year. In this case, McInnis, who began her role in July 2024, was paid $890,194 between July 2024 and December 2024, not between July 2024 and June 2025.

Today, we updated the article to accurately characterize McInnis' reported salary. We also removed commentary on the inaccurate figure and comparisons between her compensation and other Ivy League presidents' salaries that year. The News regrets this error.

November 10, 1988 / Students rally against racism

Yale Hillel and the Black Student Alliance organized a gathering titled "A Rally Against Racist Violence," which took place last night. Marking the 50th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the 200-person-strong rally called on the Yale community to take action against the recent rise in racist acts on campus.
