Behind the Headline

By Aspyn Kaskalla

With Yale Daily News heeling season underway, I took on my very first assignment for the arts desk. Waiting in line on Monday night outside College Street Music Hall before Bikini Kill's show, I searched for concertgoers willing to talk. The crowd was reserved at first, but between conversations I had in line and at the barricade before and between sets, I gathered a handful of voices ahead of the show.

Those interviews set up a night that delivered on its promise: sharp displays of musicianship, a charged crowd and moments of political commentary from the stage. One remark from lead singer Kathleen Hanna stood out, becoming key in my own reporting process. Mid-set, amid conflict in the pit, she addressed the audience directly: "We don't want to bring more misogynistic violence," she said. "We don't want to bring more transphobia. We don't want to bring more racism."

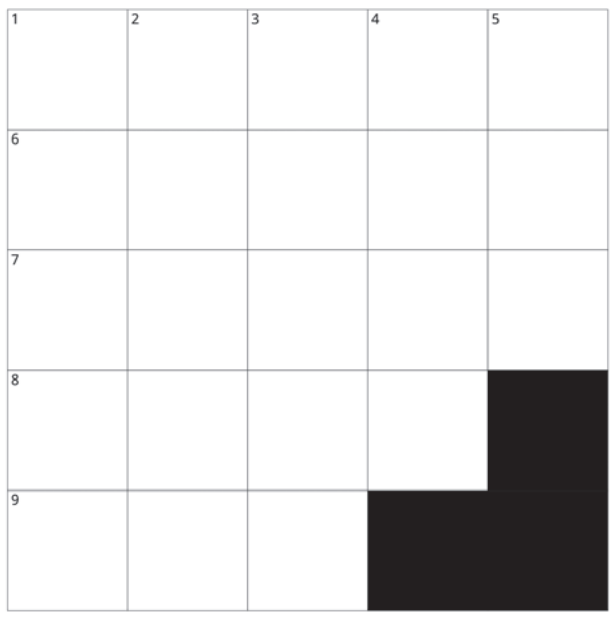

Read "Bikini Kill brings punk-rock roar back to New Haven" on page 10.

CORRECTION:
Sept. 22: An earlier version of Oyshi Monawarah's opinion article, "Eyes at every stop," incorrectly referred to seven cameras installed by New Haven as ALPRs; they are ATESDs, according to the NHPD. The article has been updated to make clear that the NHPD's ALPR cameras are from Rekor, as well as to distinguish ALPRs from ATESDs. The article has been updated to specify that the NHPD has not adopted AI-powered body camera transcription department-wide. The article now clarifies that the NHPD has not opted into Rekor's data-sharing platform.

After budget cuts eliminate dinner at Commons, graduate students, undergrads and union members protest. Their protest involves making a replica of Commons out of cake and cutting it, an ode to Marie Antoinette.
