Behind the Headline

By Chuer Cindy Zhong

I first heard about La Cocina de Sandra from Denisse Cruz-Contreras, a co-director of Havenly, a nonprofit that trains refugees and closed its café over the summer due to federal grant cuts. When I interviewed Sandra for my very first YDN article of the year, she mentioned that a new restaurant started by one of their cohort graduates would be taking Havenly Cafe's place. I knew right away that I had to be at their grand opening. What can I say? I wanted to write about something starting instead of ending, a "passing of the torch," as Galvez so perfectly described.

When I walked into the restaurant, Denisse greeted me in a bright dress with an even brighter smile and thanked me for being there. For the next hour, I talked to guests and jotted down details about the space. Enveloped by the chatter of different Spanish dialects and the smell of wafting spices, I felt at home in a place I never could have pictured myself in just a year or two ago.

These days, it's easy to grow numb to the news. When I write about local businesses and how their owners are affected by the nation's policies, I hope to show our community that what happens in Washington, D.C., doesn't just stay there. The Capitol can seem a world away, until its decisions reach the shop down the block.

CORRECTIONS:

An earlier version of Nausicaa Chu's article, "Yale denies fault in fatal accident," misstated the entity to which responsibility for the Yale Golf Course was transferred this year. It is Yale Operations, not the Yale Office of Facilities.

An earlier version of Jayden Dao's article, "Athlete majors skew toward social science," included graphs that contained incorrect data. The graphs with corrected data can now be found online. A previous version of the article also misstated the percentage of sampled athletes and non-athletes who majored in the humanities and arts. Majors in the humanities and arts represented 7.5 percent of athletes, not 8.3 percent, and 20.8 percent of non-athletes, not 24.2 percent.

Due to an editing error, an earlier version of Sasha Cabral and Sarah Rivas' article, "Conservatives split about speech," misstated the name of Mór Szepesi.
