Behind the Headline

By Greta Garrison and Aliza Shyovitz

A proposal to allow drones to operate out of Amazon's North Haven facility stuck out as something that could not only make real changes for local residents' shopping habits, but also have broader implications for the changing world we live in.

To explore how people here felt about the proposal, we headed over to interview locals in the affected area, knocking on doors, talking to folks raking leaves outside their homes and listening to people's thoughts while they enjoyed ice cream at Elena's on Orange. We also went to the North Haven facility to check out where the development would be based.

The responses we got from residents were wide-ranging, and some residents were unsure about how to feel. A number of people hadn't heard about the proposal at all. While the proposal awaits a final decision, it might be worth considering the questions we could soon be asking while looking up at our skies: Is that a bird? Is it a plane? Or is it an Amazon delivery drone?

Read "Plan for Amazon delivery drones draws mixed reactions" on page 8.

This Day in Yale History, 1963

October 30, 1963 / Smooch hero kisses, kisses and kisses, kisses and kisses

By S.M.L. Aronson

Last night, George P. Levendis, class of 1964, was declared the leading campus hustler by the Smooch Committee. This decision was based upon reliable information that stated that Levendis is almost never in his room before two in the morning, sometimes never coming back at all.

CORRECTION:

A previous version of an article by Evelyn Ronan, "Law School advocacy clinic requests records on ICE arrests at Tweed," misstated the name of the Yale Law School clinic that requested public records about ICE arrests at Tweed New Haven Airport. It is the Worker and Immigrant Rights Advocacy Clinic, not the Worker and Immigration Rights Advocacy Clinic.
